There is too much bending the knee to the mob today. The majority has become more important than morality.

G.K. Chesterton has reminded us that morality, like art, begins when you draw the line. When men quit drawing the line and work furiously with the other end of the pencil to erase what has already been drawn, things are bound to get muddled.

Imagine a football game in which there are no goals, yard lines, boundaries, or referees. Those who want to talk about football without rules destroy football.

To talk of life without rules, values, and morality is to destroy life or meaningful life. Running around and tossing a football doesn't make a football game, and "doing things" doesn't make a life.

"Do your own thing" can be silly if all we mean is "blow your own nose" -- and it can be selfish if it means "do what you want to do, and don't worry about others."
